The project of horizontal sails as climate shelters in Sant Sadurní d'Anoia (Barcelona) aims to enhance the experience of those visiting one of the city's main streets, where the market takes place twice a week.
During heat waves, these sails provide shade and reduce temperature, offering comfort to both vendors and shoppers. Their installation combines functionality and aesthetics, integrating harmoniously into the urban environment.
Interviews were conducted with local residents, who highlighted the project's success, the refreshing feeling under the sails, and their attractive design. Many suggested that similar initiatives could be replicated in other cities.
This project reflects the commitment of the City Council and BENITO URBAN to creating more comfortable, sustainable urban spaces adapted to citizens' needs. An example of how design can improve daily life in public spaces.
